Nov. 12, 1993 ☁

I saw this picture in this week's Time magazine. A photographer named Gregory Heisler sent the picture to Time. The boys in the picture are all wearing different clothes, but they all share the same face. They do not just look like each other. In fact, they are the same person. Heisler "made" this funny picture on the computer. But in the future, with the science of 'cloning' (copying living things), a picture like this one may not just be a computer trick.

The idea of cloning began a long time ago. It became real when some animals like frogs were successfully cloned. At first, I didn't care much about these studies. However, when some studies showed that even "people" could be cloned, I felt the studies had gone too far.

I don't know much about science, but I do know I would hate to live on a planet full of copies of me. I found myself scared by the smiles of the copied boys when I looked at the picture again. To me, a world of cloned people is a world where the rules of nature are broken, which may bring a lot of problems we've never thought of.
